Roger. Meantime, Pat is working on yet another story- also due today. I've cut and pasted her messages from our back-and-forth just now:

"Robert, I'm seeing there's a "good news" story for EPA. The more I explore EPA's various new chemical websites today, the more I realize that the agency has posted a lot more information. I intend to write a short story today about more info. being available. It would be good for my readers and for EPA to let its voice be heard about what it's done. For today's story and, separately, for the special report.

Yes, I must write the story today, because EPA has made the new information available today.

I'd love to know how many new chemicals are still under review by the agency. I looks like dozens maybe hundreds have been cleared. That would be consistent with something I heard, which is that there are only about 200 new chemicals under review.

I'd love to know whether this is a sign that the agency is being able to review new chemicals more quickly than—apparently—it had been. Or perhaps the agency has been chugging along all the time, but couldn't say anything until all this was officially posted. I'd love to discuss on the questions I posed for my special report, but the main thing would be to talk to someone who can tell me authoritatively what's been newly posted. My gut says this is the info. folks have been waiting for; I've already got one comment to that effect, but I need to hear from EPA what it has done."
